In the quiet of the morning, Arash walked slowly down the hallway towards his new classroom. His footsteps echoed clearly, as if they were the only sound filling the space. His heart raced, a mix of nervousness and hope. In the back of his mind, he wondered if today would mark a good beginning for him at this school.

Arash stopped in front of the classroom door, doubting his decision to be there.

Suddenly, Ammar appeared and tried to greet him.

Arash stepped to the front of the class and introduced himself to all his classmates.

After class, Arash met with the teacher and expressed his desire to transfer to another class, feeling that he didn't belong there.

His request was denied by the teacher, who encouraged him to try adapting to the new environment. Reluctantly, Arash accepted the decision with a heavy heart.

However, he didn't give up and tried asking the teacher again the next day. This time, the teacher became a little angry and advised him firmly, urging him to make the effort to adjust and not rush into decisions.

Unbeknownst to Arash, Zakir had been watching the entire incident from a distance. He grinned to himself, already plotting something mischievous.

After the break, all the students returned to class and began whispering about something, their curious glances occasionally shifting toward Arash.

Arash felt uncomfortable, sensing that he had become the center of attention. The whispers and stares only made him more anxious.

However, Arash, not wanting to pay attention to the whispers, chose to ignore them. From a distance, Ammar moved closer to Arash and tried to speak with him.

Suddenly, Zakir approached Arash and shouted towards him, accusing him of being a thief. The sudden outburst caught everyone's attention, and the class fell silent.

Arash, shocked and terrified, immediately stood up and ran out of the classroom, his heart pounding as he tried to escape the weight of the accusation.

Ammar, shocked by the situation, stood frozen in place. However, his eyes were drawn to Arash's school bag, which had been left behind in the rush.

Ammar opened Arash's bag with a sense of fear, hoping that Arash wasn't the one at fault. As he checked, he found nothing suspicious. However, his eyes were drawn to Arash's sketchbook, tucked away inside the bag.

Ammar took the sketchbook and looked through it. Suddenly, a smile spread across his face as an idea sparked in his mind.

Arash sat alone in the library, surrounded by the quiet atmosphere, trying to calm his racing thoughts. The stillness of the room offered him a brief escape from the chaos of the classroom.

Amar appeared out of nowhere and greeted Arash, his presence breaking the silence of the library.

Amar told Arash that he had seen his sketchbook and had an idea. Arash was startled, surprised that Amar knew about the book. He hadn't expected anyone to notice it.

Amar suggested that Arash join the art exhibition, praising his artwork as being really good. However, Arash doubted himself and rejected the idea, feeling unsure if he was ready for something like that.

Arash remembered how, back at his old school, his classmates had mocked his artwork. Since then, he had lost his confidence and couldn't bring himself to believe in his abilities anymore.

Amar continued to persuade Arash, telling him that not everyone understood art, and that there might be others who would appreciate his work if they saw it. He encouraged Arash to take a chance, reminding him that his art had value, even if some people couldn't see it.

Arash was touched by Amar's words, and for the first time in a while, he felt a spark of confidence. Maybe, just maybe, his artwork could be appreciated after all.

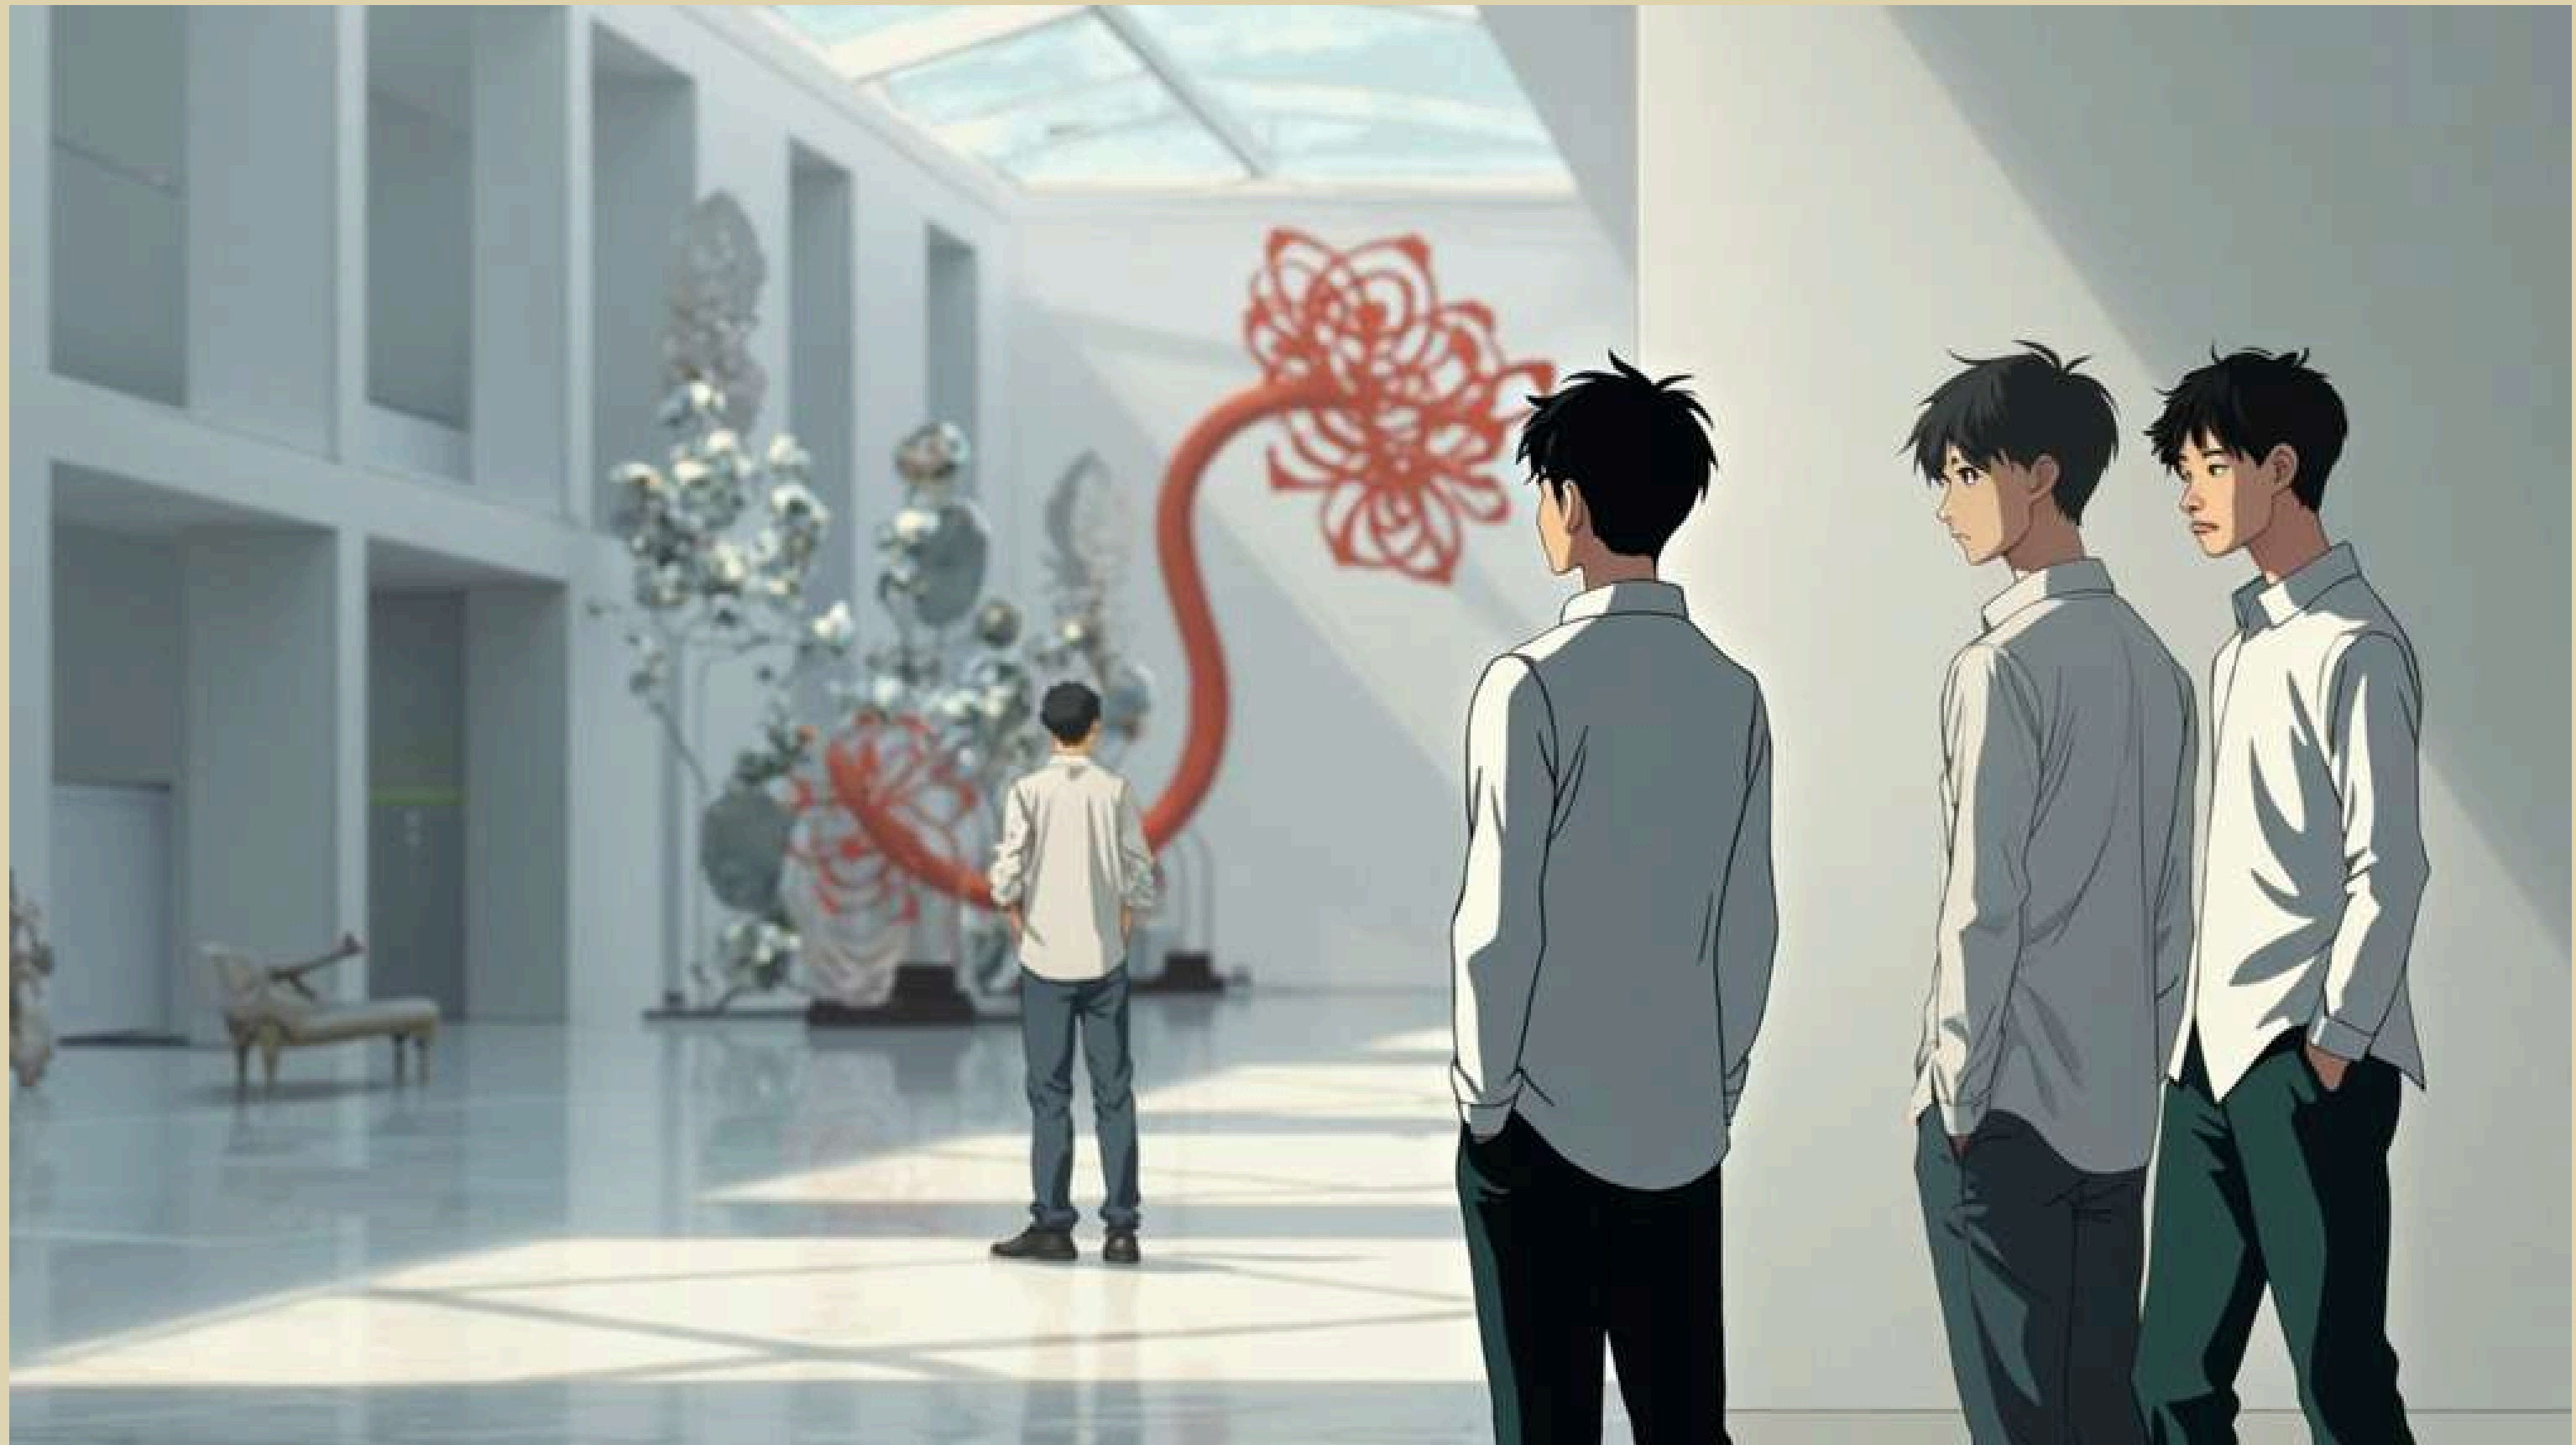

On the day of the art exhibition, more and more people gathered, flooding in with excitement and curiosity. The room was buzzing with energy as visitors admired the displayed artworks.

Arash couldn't believe it. People were starting to praise his work, and his pieces quickly became the center of attention. The compliments made his heart swell with pride, and he felt a sense of accomplishment he hadn't experienced before.

However, things didn't stop there. Amid the crowd, Haikal and his friends arrived. Haikal was the bully from Arash's old school, and his presence immediately made Arash uneasy.

Amar was shocked by Haikal and his friends' arrival. He could sense Arash's fear, and suddenly, Arash's confidence started to fade. Haikal, with a mocking grin, teased Arash, calling him the same "weirdo" he had been before.

Furious with the situation, Amar stood up to defend Arash. He told Haikal and his friends that Arash was talented, not a weirdo. Only people who were blind to art wouldn't see its value.

It didn't stop there. Arash's classmates began to gather around, agreeing with Amar's words. They all stood up to defend Arash. Haikal and his friends, stunned by the turn of events, started to tremble and quickly ran out of the place.

The next morning, Amar noticed that some students were still whispering among themselves. This time, their expressions were serious, and it seemed like they were talking about something important.

Amar approached them, and one of the girls spoke up. She revealed that she had seen who the real thief was that day, and it wasn't Arash.

The girl added that the stolen item was still in Zakir's locker.

Amar went to the teacher and explained everything. The teacher followed him to the class and asked Zakir to confess, but Zakir denied the accusation.

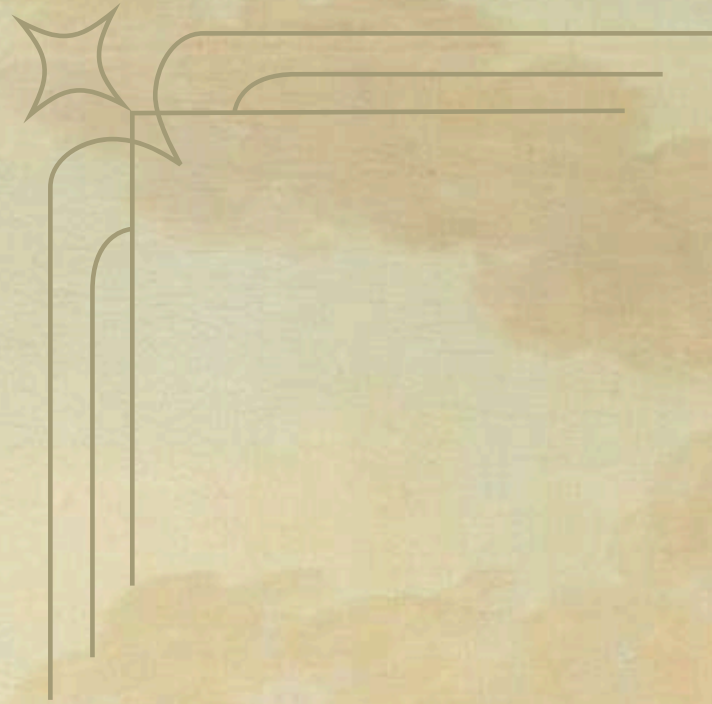

The teacher scolded Zakir and told him that actions would be taken against him for both stealing and falsely accusing Arash.

All of Arash's classmates who witnessed the incident felt guilty and apologized to him. They admitted that they should have asked Arash first instead of blindly believing Zakir's words.

Amar felt a sense of relief after everything had unfolded. He was grateful to Arash for his support throughout. In the end, Arash decided to stay in the class, surrounded by good friends who had helped him along the way. He no longer felt ashamed to showcase his talent, something he had kept hidden for so long, and he was proud to share it with everyone.
